After being in hiding for a year, Ghislaine Maxwell, a British socialite who was a close friend and former girlfriend of convicted paedophile Jeffrey Epstein, was apprehended by the FBI yesterday.

For the past 12 months, there have been various sightings and reports of her whereabouts, none verified, with some pointing to France as a possible hideout spot thanks to her French citizenship, and even conspiracy theories alleging that Maxwell was a foreign intelligence asset working for Israel, where her father Robert Maxwell is buried. There was even a bogus photograph of her eating at an In N Out burger in California. But none proved fruitful. Until now.

Where Maxwell has actually been hiding for all that time has now been revealed as this four-bedroom, four-bathroom mountain-top bolthole in Bradford, New Hampshire, dubbed 'Tuckedaway'. It's a property usually favoured by hikers and ramblers keen to spend time in the great outdoors, thanks to its remote location.

This also means that it is super private, too, with no neighbours, 156 acres of dense forest surrounding the house (it boasts views from every room to Mt Sunapee foothills to the west), and a long dirt track with new metal gates. It was sold to a company called Granite Realty LLC last December for $1 million.

The realtors describe the fantastic views on their website: 'From the covered front porch to ceiling fieldstone fireplace, cathedral ceiling, and a spectacular chandelier, a wall of glass frames a stunning southwestern view beyond the stone patio.'

Other details about how Maxwell remained in hiding have also been revealed, including the fact that she moved several times, changed her phone number and email address and had packages delivered to a different name. She was in court yesterday for six charges including trafficking minors for sex and with perjury for later denying it. The charges relate to 1994-1997, and involve three victims, the youngest of which is 14.
